

Swedish island beats San Francisco, film shows

Travellers now have an opportunity to discover island life by getting their own Swedish island

No electricity. No cars. And a grand total of 150 inhabitants – in the summer only. Travellers now have an opportunity to discover island life by getting their own Swedish islands – in the summer only. The island of Rödölga, way out in the archipelago north of Stockholm, provides a sharp contrast to the city and area of San Francisco in the US, which, for its part, bustles with several million people in the metropolitan area.

Yet the chef of a successful bakery chain leaves behind the Bay Area for Rödölga: to save the local café, which also serves as a social and economic lifeline for the small island community. That is the story told in Sweet Story, a documentary written, directed and produced by Justine Kerish and Matt Maude, recognised at the LA Film Awards and the Annual TASTE Awards in 2025.

As much as pastry chef Meg Ray, whose adventure the film tells, the directors also fell in love with the island of Rödölga, its nature and relaxed, community-spirited lifestyle.

“I think that way of living is an ode to imagination, the importance of community and boredom,” Maude told the Desert Sun newspaper.

Rödölga is only one of 30,014 islands in the Stockholm archipelago, offering a special blend of energy and calm. Altogether, there are more than 267,000 islands in Sweden – more than in any other country in the world.

Whether life on a Swedish island is for them as much as it was for US pastry chef Meg Ray, is something international travellers may now test: Through the initiative Your Swedish Island, Sweden is giving away five of its islands for one year.

The initiative launched by Visit Sweden and the National Property Board highlights Sweden’s special relationship with nature.

“Sweden has more islands than any other country in the world, and we would like to invite people to enjoy what may be the most genuine form of luxury: the peace and tranquillity of nature on their own island”, said Susanne Andersson, CEO at Visit Sweden, at the launch of the initiative.
