

Sweden invites travellers to experience more by being fully present

Some things are better done than documented.

STOCKHOLM, Sweden — 23 June 2026 — Visit Sweden is drawing attention to hands-on travel as a way for international travellers to exchange digital distractions for active, tactile engagement with Swedish nature, food, craft and culture. By prioritizing participation over passive observation, Sweden responds to growing demand for travel that supports mental recovery, deeper cultural connection and more memorable experiences.

In a time when travel is increasingly shaped by constant input, digital distractions and the pressure to capture every moment, Sweden offers something different: opportunities to slow down through active participation. Those who take part often return home with more than just photos: they return with new skills, stronger memories and a clearer sense of connection to the place they visited.

Why is hands-on travel relevant now?

Research suggests that travellers are increasingly looking for trips that feel restorative, immersive and genuinely engaging. According to Amadeus' Travel Dreams 2026 report, 41% of travellers aspire to return from a trip with a calmer nervous system, while one third describe an ideal destination as one where they are inspired to digitally detox because the world around them is more interesting. American Express' 2026 Global Travel Trends Report also highlights the rise of "sight-doing", with travellers seeking hands-on local workshops and activities that help them connect more deeply with a place and its culture.

"Travellers increasingly value experiences they can actively participate in rather than simply observe. In Sweden, many of those experiences are found in nature, local traditions and everyday life—and often become the memories that stay with people long after they return home," says Susanne Andersson, CEO of Visit Sweden.

How does active participation support a more memorable trip?

When the hands are engaged, the mind often follows. Hands-on activities can help travellers focus on the task at hand, reduce mental noise and create a more grounded connection to their surroundings. In Sweden, these experiences are often closely tied to nature, traditional skills and local food culture, giving visitors practical ways to slow down, learn by doing and experience the destination through participation rather than constant capture.
